It is a great pleasure to introduce this issue on emerging ideas in health services research, biological, pharmaceutical, integrated health sciences in the International Journal of Pharmacy & Integrated Health Sciences (IJPIHS). We encourage studies with rigorous methodology and contributions because this is essential to ensure that the conclusions drawn from the journal's publications are true and reliable. All articles provide interesting, novel and useful results covering different areas pharmaceutical chemistry, pharmaceutics, pharmacogenomics, pharmacology, natural product research, nanotechnology, bioinformatics, biotechnology, environmental sciences and genetic engineering. The newest studies dealing with biomedical applications are summarized in this issue of IJPIHS, with "new frontiers" playing a crucial role in this regard. Review articles and original research covering all facets of pharmaceutical and integrated health sciences, as well as cutting-edge protocols and techniques to assess healthcare professionals' knowledge, attitudes, and practices regarding various clinical issues, are among the contributions for this issue.

We encourage reports and commentaries on current problems in pharmaceutical and medical practices. Papers focusing on multidisciplinary collaboration and evidence-based clinical practice are especially encouraged. Editorials, comments, reviews (including systematic overviews and meta-analyses), original research and reports are regular features of the journal.
As the Editor-in-Chief of the International Journal of Pharmacy & Integrated Health Sciences, I would like to thank Dr. Kanwal Ashiq, Dr. Ayesha Mustafa, Dr. Maryam Khalid, and Dr. Syed Ahmed Shah (Ph.D.) for their encouragement and support, as well as the entire publishing staff at Superior University for their crucial assistance in putting this issue together. I would like to thank all authors and reviewers for their significant contributions.

This edition is intended to help readers with their research, and we hope that they will. We look forward to receiving your submissions.
